* The Smart Developer

Before you rush into the assisted living market, do your homework.
It's the key to your success.
by Lee E. Cory

FIRST THINGS FIRST

Most senior housing developers approach new projects backwards. They find a site and then try to justify why it would be perfect for an assisted living facility. But a smart developer identifies the market first; investigates the needs, preferences, desires, lifestyles and peculiarities of a specific target audience; then chooses a potential site and hires a consultant to perform a feasibility study.

Before even looking at land, you must define your market. The typical target audience for an ALF are seniors aged 75 and older with self care and/or mobility limitations and annual incomes of $25,000 or more. However, recent studies show that up to 65 percent of private-pay AL residents have incomes below that level, indicating that they have unreported sources of income.

Another important target market is seniors' adult children (aged 45-64) with annual incomes over $50,000. Up to 80 percent of the residents living in private-pay ALFs or their adult children meet these age and income parameters and live within the primary market area, which is within three miles of the facility, unless otherwise demarked by natural or manmade boundaries, such as coasts, rivers or freeways.
